

A Supreme Conclusion

Veteran New York Times Reporter Linda Greenhouse Closes Supreme Semester with Commencement Keynote

by Michael M. Bowden

*L*inda Greenhouse, a veteran New York Times reporter, closed the Supreme Court semester with a commencement keynote address at the University of Pennsylvania Law School on May 15. Greenhouse, who has covered the Supreme Court for more than 20 years, is the first woman to give the keynote address at the law school's commencement. She spoke to a crowd of about 1,000 people, including law school graduates, faculty, and family members. Her address focused on the importance of the rule of law and the role of the judiciary in a democratic society. Greenhouse also reflected on her own career and the challenges she has faced as a woman in a male-dominated profession. She concluded her address with a quote from Justice Brandeis: "The right to be left alone is the most comprehensive of rights and rights right of privacy." Greenhouse's address was widely praised and is expected to be a key part of the law school's commencement records.

Greenhouse's address was widely praised and is expected to be a key part of the law school's commencement records. She spoke to a crowd of about 1,000 people, including law school graduates, faculty, and family members. Her address focused on the importance of the rule of law and the role of the judiciary in a democratic society. Greenhouse also reflected on her own career and the challenges she has faced as a woman in a male-dominated profession. She concluded her address with a quote from Justice Brandeis: "The right to be left alone is the most comprehensive of rights and rights right of privacy." Greenhouse's address was widely praised and is expected to be a key part of the law school's commencement records.

